Czech Point Eases Bureaucratic Burden

Following a pilot project last year, Czech Point, a network of electronic access points aimed at providing easy access to new e-government services, has been launched with an aim to improve the Czech Republic's dated bureaucratic system significantly, according to European ePractice Newsletter.

The scheme should simplify interaction between citizens and the public administration, which is renowned for its archaic complexities. Now citizens will be able to access all public records by way of a one-stop portal, rather than having to visit several different offices.

"Currently, a citizen is forced to visit several government offices to solve a single problem," said government spokesperson, Jana Bartošová. The new access points will put a stop to this, "making the data – not the citizen – run around."

According to the Czech Interior Ministry, more than 1,500 Czech Points are now in operation at post offices and municipal bureaus throughout the Czech Republic, as well as in the Czech embassies in Bratislava, Warsaw, Dresden, Berlin, Vienna, and Washington, D.C. At present, the terminals provide certified documents for many frequently sought public records, including criminal records and the land and commercial registers.

In the future, it is expected that Czech Point will provide access to all data stored in public registers and will
